Strengths and Limitations of Household-based Surveys

Kelly Raley
Population Research Center & Department of Sociology
University of Texas - Austin
Strengths and Limitations of Household-based Surveys... for what purpose?

Why do we study family? (my answers)

- Family structures social ties, resource sharing, identity
- Family structures population processes – fertility, migration, health
- Family reveals social boundaries

Question: Why do you study family? (If your motivations aren’t mentioned, add them to this conversation)
Benefits of Household-based sampling for achieving research goals:

- Known sampling frame and population
- Comparability with other data collections
- Coresidence is meaningful
Limitations of Household-based sampling for achieving research goals:

Non-institutionalized populations and temporary household members

Interdependencies across households

Assumes coresidence is meaningful, important

expensive

Questions:

How can we best capture family ties within and across households? (contact, communication, exchange, belonging)

(When) should we treat household and family ties differently than other types of social ties?