Before the days of wire services or news bureaus, newspapers frequently printed letters from local soldiers to provide more in-depth coverage of war news. Since regiments were recruited by geographical regions, most of the men serving in a unit were neighbors, and their families often shared letters with each other. Some soldiers specifically arranged to send reports of company news to their hometown newspapers. This index, prepared by Dan Masters, records soldiers' correspondence printed in area newspapers during the Civil War. Researchers should be aware that this index does not necessarily represent the holdings of the Center for Archival Collections. Those wishing to review the news articles or editorials cited here should consult our newspaper holdings.
